

People-Centered Designed topics represented in the Hi-fi prototypes

In the Hi-fi prototype we used lots of signifiers to help guide the user through the webpage. The menu uses a basic hamburger icon which is industry standard for most websites that have a large menu. We also used icons on each menu item to give some visual reference to what the page may contain and it also just contains some visual interest. Another way we used signifiers in our webpage is through color. We use a different color on our menu to signify sub pages under a menu item, and we use colors to show important information which include buttons, and titles.

Another aspect of the design was consistency. We used the same page layout to make every page understandable and familiar. This is also seen in our menu where all the information in the menu stays consistent for all pages and again seems familiar.

We also incorporated the design topic of constraints into our hi-fi design. This was most easily seen with a lock-in in the photos archive. Once clicking on a photo album, a carousel of the images is displayed on the center of the screen with the rest of background of the screen grayed out until you close the carousel display or click out of it.

Affordance was another design topic that we have implemented in our hi-fi design. The majority of the clickable components in our design have a different color compared to the background color, also, they often come with a surrounded box or stroke. The users can quickly identify what is clickable with just a glance. The clickable elements also contain text that directly tells the user what action will be performed. For some clickable buttons on the website such as the three elements on our contact page, we also used stroked boxes to indicate which button we have clicked.

Furthermore, when there are multiple clickable buttons in one area such as “upload to current music” and “upload to archive”, we always use different colors to differentiate them.
